Yukon government supports museums and First Nation cultural and heritage centres

WHITEHORSE—The Yukon government is providing more than $1.5 million to Yukon museums and interpretive centres through two of its funding programs.

"The Yukon government recognizes the tremendous contribution made by the museums and First Nation cultural and heritage centres which preserve and interpret our unique history," Minister of Tourism and Culture Mike Nixon said. "This investment assists with the operation of these facilities and the management of their collections, along with funding for specialized museum projects."

The Dawson City Museum will receive $100,000 annually for three years through the Museum Contribution Program to assist with the costs associated with managing and operating the museum.

"Dawson City Museum is a dynamic facility that presents the history of the Klondike region with engaging, informative exhibits and vibrant programs," executive director Laura Mann said. "This three-year agreement provides funding which allows us to continue providing an exceptional, high quality museum experience to visitors and Yukoners."

The John Tizya Centre in Old Crow will receive $17,775 in funding through the Special Projects Capital Assistance Program for The Sound We See: Old Crow, a locally produced film exhibit for the centre. It will be made by local filmmakers working with mentors from Bite Size Media of Vancouver and the Echo Park Film Center in Los Angeles.

"The Sound We See exhibit is an excellent collaboration between professional filmmakers and community members who will share their stories about life in Old Crow," Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Chief Joe Linklater said. "Local film production not only adds dynamic elements to the John Tizya Centre exhibits but also reaches a wider online audience and enhances local film production skills. We're proud to have Old Crow join other The Sound We See productions from Hanoi, Rotterdam and Los Angeles."
